Seemingly nonchalant, hands in his pockets, the ringleader of the Paris attacks strolls into a Metro station wearing garish orange trainers. It is 10.14 pm on the night that stunned the world.

Having slaughtered up to 20 people in cafes and bars with an automatic rifle just an hour earlier, Abdelhamid Abaaoud, 28, has abandoned his AK-47 and his rented black Seat car at Montreuil, an eastern suburb of the French capital

With police flooding the city, he might be expected to disappear into the night. But, chillingly, his murderous work is by no means over.

Masked 'ISIS gunman who tried to execute Philadelphia cop by...

'It's fine to hit a wife who doesn't please you': What...

Instead, from Montreuil's Croix de Chavaux station and accompanied by an unidentified man, he takes Line 9 straight back to the city centre, the scene of his appalling crimes: first to revel in the aftermath, and then to orchestrate yet more carnage.

These remarkable pictures, the first to show Abaaoud on the night of the attacks that killed 130 people on November 13, are from surveillance film released yesterday, along with a more precise account of the monstrous sequence of events.

In another image, one of Abaaoud's fellow Islamic State (IS) fanatics, Brahim Abdeslam, is shown inside the Comptoir Voltaire cafe at 9.41 pm, walking between seated customers, seconds before he activates his suicide belt.

Witnesses saw white smoke coming from his coat, followed by two flashes. He landed on a table where two young men were seated, a gaping hole in his back.

Feathers from Abdeslam's anorak filled the room. Mercifully, while several customers were seriously injured, he killed only himself. His blood was later found to show traces of cannabis.

Meanwhile, with the journey from Croix de Chavaux to central Paris taking around 25 minutes, by 11pm Abaaoud was mingling with horrified witnesses to his carnage in the 10th arrondissement.

Perhaps doing so sharpened his sense of satisfaction as he surveyed his dreadful handiwork. Some recalled how clean-cut and relaxed he seemed; some remembered his orange trainers.

Abaaoud then drifted towards the Bataclan concert hall, where 150 people were still being held hostage. Crouching in a doorway, he directed the final murderous scenes unfolding inside by whispering instructions into his mobile phone. In all, 89 men and women died in the theatre.

Earlier phone records showed Abaaoud had similarly controlled Bilal Hadfi, one of the bombers who blew himself up at the Stade de France.

The Paris prosecutor, Francis Molins, said records showed Abaaoud's phone was in the vicinity of the city centre attacks until 12.28am. Only then did he melt away. For four nights he slept in a ticket near the A86 autoroute.

Attack: In another image, one of Abaaoud's fellow Islamic State (IS) fanatics, Brahim Abdeslam, is shown inside the Comptoir Voltaire cafe at 9.41 pm, walking between seated customers, seconds before he activates his suicide belt

The following day, Abaaoud, his female cousin Hasna Ait Boulahcen and other gunmen died in a police raid on an apartment in the northern Paris suburb of Saint Denis. Abaaoud was still wearing his orange trainers.

Investigators said Abaaoud and the others died when an unidentified accomplice detonated a suicide vest. The 5,000 rounds fired by police didn't touch them.

It later emerged that Abaaoud had pictures of locations in Birmingham stored on his smartphone, raising the possibility that his cell was planning atrocities in Britain.

Other footage that emerged yesterday showed that Brahim Abdeslam, his brother Salah Abdeslam and another jihadi, Mohamed Abrini, travelled to Paris from Brussels in a Renault Clio in the early hours of November 13.

They headed first to Charleroi, an hour south of Brussels, where they are understood to have picked up weapons. At 4pm they headed to the French-Belgian border and at 5.40pm the trio stopped at a service station. Surveillance footage shows Abrini and the Abdeslam brothers get out of the Clio before walking around the station shop.

The car, rented by Salah Abdeslam, was found abandoned in the 18th arrondissement of Paris. Salah, who managed to escape police, is still on the run, the most wanted man in Europe.

Yesterday it emerged that Belgian police found three suicide belts, explosives and Salah's fingerprint at a Brussels flat that may have served as a bomb factory.

Prosecutors said Salah Abdeslam might have hidden in the flat after the November 13 attacks. They are working on the theory the explosive devices used in the massacre could have been made there.

The discovery was made on December 10 during a search of an apartment in the Schaerbeek area of the Belgian capital, but investigators would not say why they waited a month to announce it. The flat, on Rue Henri Berge, was rented by someone using a false name, possibly another suspect now in custody over the attacks, they said.

It emerged last week that the three teams dispatched by IS to attack Paris received instructions in real time via mobile phone from someone in Brussels.

STOPOVER FOR SUPPLIES EN ROUTE TO THE NIGHT OF CARNAGE IN PARIS

On their way to Paris from Belgium, three of the jihadists – Salah Abdeslam, Brahim Abdeslam and Mohamed Abrini – were seen on CCTV cameras as they stopped off at a service station on the French-Brussels border.

Salah, 26, the only terrorist to survive, remains on the run as Europe's most wanted man.

The three terrorists were heading for Paris in a car rented by Salah, who was taken out of the capital after the attacks by an accomplice.

The Brussels 'choreographer' has not been identified. An estimated 250 jihadists have returned from Syria and are on the loose in France.

A state of emergency remains in place across the country following the attacks, with police and soldiers flooding all major cities and towns.

Yesterday, President Francois Hollande led tributes to Clarissa Jean-Philippe, a police dead by a terrorist the day after the Charlie Hebdo attacks in January 2015.

250 jihadists have returned from Syria back into France. Us Britons also have 400 or so back. Why on earth are they allowed to live amongst us when they have a clear mandate to cause harm? Absolute madness - why can't Mrs May forget their rights and keep us safe ?
